Here are a few tips to help you identify job scams:

Remember, if the opportunity seems "too good to be true," it's probably a scam.

- No experience is needed: the job is so simple that your 8-year-old nephew could do it. You don't need any specific skill set, education or experience.
- They want you to start ASAP (today if possible) and you must respond immediately (they don't want you to think about how foolish this offer is or do any research on them).
- They are so impressed with you that no interview is needed (really, what have you done that is so impressive?[©]).
- They received your contact information from our office or from someone in our office (our office does not give out students' contact information).
- You look at their website and there is no place for customers or potential customers to inquire about products and services offered. What company doesn't promote its products or services?
- The email is from a Gmail or Yahoo account and not a business URL. Instead of an employer's domain name, scammers often use a company's actual name embedded in a generic URL.
- They don't list a single company they have done work for/with but yet they claim to work with Fortune 500 companies or they are the current leader in the market in their geographic area.
- Job postings that ask you to advance/wire money to begin employment, no legitimate employer asks you for money in order for them to hire you.
- You will be processing payments: There is no legitimate job that requires people to receive money, keep a portion as a commission and send the rest on. Think about it!
- Accepting packages for pay: they send you packages and you repackage and then send them on to the intended receiver. Most likely the goods have been stolen and you are now a partner in the crime/fraud.
- Job postings that ask you to send personal information (social security number, DOB, etc.) in order to apply.
- Urgent wording, impersonal messages, or frequent use of improper grammar.
